Course Structure

The Knowledge Development section

The knowledge development portion develops the principles and information you need for preventing and handling dive emergencies, with topics including self rescue, diver stress, diving first aid, emergency management, equipment problems, and rescue and assistance procedures for both conscious and unconscious victims on the surface and underwater.

The Confined Water Section

The confined water sessions are designed to help prepare you for the open water sessions and include most of the skills of the open water sessions. The confined water sessions introduce you to the open water skills as well as allow you to master the more difficult skills in a controlled, calm environment before attempting them in the open water.

The Practical Application section

During the open water training, you will apply the knowledge you've learned as you develop rescue skills. As you master rescue techniques, you'll learn to adapt what you practice to suit the situation: your physical attributes, those of the victim and the nature of the diving environment.
